was building he fent fome of his marabonts, (ambassadors) to Tremecen, (now a province of Algiers) at that time inhabitant by a powerful, infolent sect of Mahometans called Zeneti. The design of this embassy was to bring them back to what he called the true faith; but the Zeneti, despising his offers, assembled at Amasa their capital and murdered the ambassadors, and invaded Joseph's dominions with an army of 50,000 men.

The King hearing of their infamous proceedings, speedily mustered his army, and led it, by long marches, into their country, destroying all with fire and fword; while the Zeneti, instead of opposing his progress, retired as fast as possible towards Fez, in hopes of receiving assistance from thence. In this they were miferably deceived : the Fezzens marched out against them in a hostile manner; and coming up with the unhappy Zeneti, encumbered with their families and baggage, and ready to expire with hunger and wearinefs, they cut them all to pieces except a fmall number, who were mostly drowned in attempting to swim across a river, and some others who, in their flight perished by falling from the adjacent rocks. In the mean time 10feph reduced their country to a mere defert, which was, however, foon peopled by a numerous collony of Fezzens, who fettled there under the protection of the reigning Kings. In this war it is computed that near a million of the Zeneti, men, women, and children, loft their lives.

The reftless and ambitious temper of Joseph did not let him remain long at peace. He quickly declared war against the Fezzens, reduced them to become his tributaries, and extended his conquests all along the Mediterranean. He next attacked some Arabian Cheyks, who had not yet submitted to his jurisdiction; and pursued them with such sury, that neither the Libyan deserts, nor ridges of the most craggy rocks, could shelter them from his arms. He attacked them in such of their retreats, castles, and sortresses, as were, till then, deemed impregnable; and at last subdued them, to the great grief of the other African nations, who were greatly annoyed by the ravages committed by his numerous forces.

Thus was founded the empire of the Morabites; which, however, was of no long duration; that race being in the twelfth century driven out by Mohavedin, a Marabout. This race of priests was expelled by Abdulac, governor of Fez; and he, in the thirteenth century, was ftripped of his new conquests, by the Sharifs of Hafcen, the descendants of those Arabian princes whom Abu-Texesien had formerly expelled.

The petter to secure their new dominions, the Sharifs divided them into feveral little kingdoms, or provinces; and among the rest the present kingdom of Algiers was divided into four, namely, Tremecen, Tenez, Algiers proper, and Bujeyah. The four first Monarchs, laid fo good a foundation for a lafting balance of power between their little kingdoms, that they continued for fome centuries in mutual peace and amity; but at length the King of Tremecen having ventured to violate fome of their articles, Abul-Farez, King of Terez, declared war against him, and obliged him to become his tributary. This King dying foon after, and having divided his kingdom among his three fons, new difcords arofe; which Spain taking advantage of, a powerful fleet and army was feat against Barbary, under the Count of Navarre, in 1505. This commander foon made himself master of the important cities of Oran, Bujeyah, and fome others; which fo alarmed the Algerines, that they put themselves under the protection of Selim Eutemi, a noble and warlike Arabian prince. He came to their affiliance with great numbers of his bravest fubjects, bringing with him his wife Zephira, and a fon, then about twelve years old. This, however, was not furficient to prevent the Spaniards from landing a number of forces near Algiers that same year, and obliging that metropolis to become tributary to Spain. Nor could prince Selim hinder them from building a ftrong fort on a fmall island opposite to the city, which terrified their Corfairs from failing either in or out of the harbour.

To this galling yoke the Algerines were obliged to fulmit, till the year 1516; when, hearing of the death of Fordinand King of Spain, they feat an embally to Arm's Barbaroffa, who was at this time no lefs dreaded for his valour than his furprifing fuccefs, and was then fent on a cruife with a fquadron of gallies and barks. The purport of the embaffy was, that he should come and free them from the Spanish voke; for which they agreed to pay him a gratuity, answerable to so great a service. Upon this Barbarossa immediately dispatched eighteen galleys, and thirty barks, to the affiftance of the Algerines; while he himfelf advanced towards the city with eight hundred Turks, three thousand ligelites, and two thousand Moorish volunteers. Instead of taking the nearest road to Algiers, he directed his course towards Sharshel, where Hassan another famed corfair had fettled himfelf. Him he furprifed and obliged to furrender; not without a previous promife of friendship; but no sooner had Barbarossa got him in his power, than he cut off his head; and obliged all Hallan's Turks to follow him in his new expedition.

On Barbaroffa's approach to Algiers, he was met byprince Entemi, attended by all the people of that metropolis, great and fmall; who looked for deliverance from this abandoned villain, whom they accounted invincible. He was conducted into the city amidit the acclamations of the people, and lodged in one of the noblest apartments of prince Eutemi's palace, where he was treated with the greateft distinction. Elated beyond measure with this kind reception, Barbaroffa formed a defign of becoming King of Algiers; and fearing fome opposition from the inhabitants, on account of the excesses he suffered his soldiers to commit, murdered prince Eutemi, and caused himself to be proclaimed King, his Turks and Moors crying out as he rode along the streets, " Long live King Aruch Barbarotfa, the invincible King of Algiers, the chofen of God, to deliver the people from the oppression of the Christians, and deflruction to all who shall oppose, or refuse to own him as their lawful fovereign." Thefe left threatning words for intimidated the inhabitants, already apprehensive of a geneval maffacre, that he was immediately acknowledged King. The unhappy princefs Zephira, it is faid, polloned herfelf, to avoid the brutality of this new King, whom the ansuccessfully endeavoured to flab with a dagger.

Barbaroffa was no fooner feated on the throne, than he treated his fubjects with fuch cruelty, that they used to shut up their houses and hide themselves when he appeared in public. In consequence of this, a plot was soon formed against him; but being discovered, he caused twenty of the principal conspirators to be beheaded, their bodies to be buried in a dung hill, and laid a heavy sine on those who survived. This so terrified the Algerines that they never afterwards durst attempt any thing either against Barbarossa or his successors.

In the mean time, the fon of Prince Eutemi, having fled to Oran, and put himself under the protestion of the Marquis of Gomarez, laid before that Nobleman, a plan for putting the city of Algiers into the hands of the King of Spain. Upon this, young Selim Eutemi was sent to Spain, to lay his plan before Cardinal Ximenes; who, having approved of it, sent a fleet with 10,000 land forces, under the command of Dan Francise, or, as others call him Dan Diego De Vera, to drive out the Turks and restore the young prince. But the fleet was no sooner come within sight of land, than it was dispersed by a storm, and the greatest part of the ships dashed against the rocks. Most of the Spaniards were drowned; and the sew who escaped to shore, were either killed by the Turks or made slaves.

Though Barbaroffa had nothing to boaft on this occasion, his pride and infolence were now swelled to such a degree, that he imagined himself invincible, and that the very elements conspired to make him so. The Arabians were so much alarmed at his fuccels, that they implored the affistance of Hamidal Abdes, King of Tenez, to drive the Turks out of Algiers. That prince readily undertook to do what was in his power for this purpole, provided they agreed to fettle the kingdom on himfelf and his defcendants. This propofal being accepted, he immediately fet out at the head of 10,000 Moors; and, upon his entering the Algerine dominions, was joined by all the Arabians in the country. Barbarolfa engaged him, only with 1000 Turkish mulqueteers and 500 Granada Moors; totally defeated his numerous army; purfued him to the very gates of his Capital, which he cafily made himfelf mafter of; and, having given it up to be plundered by his Turks, obliged the inhabitants to acknowlege him as their fovereign. This victory, however, was chiefly owing to the advantage which his troops had from their fire-arms; the enemy having no other weapons than arrows and javelins.

No fooner was Barbaroffa become master of the Kingdom of Tenez, than he received an embaffy from the inhabitants of Tremecen; inviting him to come to their affiftance against their then reigning prince, with whom they were diffatished on account of his having dethroned his nephew, and forced him to fly to Oran: offering him even the fovereignty, in case he accepted of their proposal. The King of Tremecen, not suspecting the treachery of the subjects, met the tyrant with an army of 6,000 horse and 3,000 foot; but Barbaroffa's artillery gave him fuch an advantage, that the King was forced to retire into the capital, which he had no fooner entered, than his head was cut off, and fent to Barbarossa, with a fresh invitation to come and take possession of the kingdom. On his approach he was met by the inhabitants, whom he received with great complaifance, and many fair promises; but beginning to tyranize as usual, his new subjects soon convinced him that they were not so passive as the inhabitants of Algiers. Apprehending, therefore, that his reign might prove uneafy and precarious, he entered into an alliance with the King of Fez, after which, he took care to fecure the rest of the cities in his new kingdom, by garrissoning them with his own troops. Some of these, however, revolted foon after; upon which he fent one of his corfairs, named Escander, a man no less cruel than himself, to reduce them. The Tremecenians now began to repent in good carneft, of their having envited fuch a tyrant to their affiftance; and held confultations on the most proper means of driving him away, and bringing back their lawful prince, Abuchen Men; but their cabals being discovered, a great number of the conspirators were massacreed in the most cruel manner. The prince had the good luck to escape to Oran, and was taken under the protection of the Marquis of Gomarez, who feat immediate advice of it to Charles V. then lately arrived in Spain, with a powerful fleet and army. That monarch immediately ordered the young King a fuccour of 10,000 men, under the command of the governor of Oran, who, under the guidance of Abuchen Men, began his march towards Tremecen; and in their way they were joined by prince Selim, with a great number of Arabs and Moors, the first thing they resolved upon was to attack the important fortress of Calau, fituated between Tremecen and Algiers, and commanded by the Corfair Escander, at the head of about 300 Turks. They invested it closely on all fides, in hopes Barbaroffa would come out of Tremecen to its relief, which would give the Tremeceneans an opportunity of keeping him out. That tyrant, however, kept close in his capital, being embarrassed by his fears of a revolt, and the politic delays of the King of Fez, who had not fent the auxillaries he promised. The garrison of Calau in the mean time made a brave defence; and in a fally they made at night, cut off near 300 Spaniards. This encouraged them to venture a second time; but they were now repulsed with great lofs, and Escander himself wounded: foon after which they furrendered upon honourable terms; but were all massacreed by the Arabians, except sixteen, who clung close to the stirrups of the King and the Spanish General.

Barbaroffa being now informed that Abuchen Men, with his Arabs, accompanied by the Spaniards, were in full march to lay fiege to Tremecen, thought proper to come out, at the head of 15.000 Turks, and 5,000 Moorish horse in order to break his way through the enemy; but he had not proceeded far from the city, before his council advised him to return and fortify himfelf in it. This advice was now too late; the inhabitants being refolved to keep him out, and open their gates to their own lawful prince, as foon as he appeared; in this diffress Barbaroffa faw no way lest but to retire to the citadel, and there defend himself till he could find an opportunity of flealing out with his men, and all his treasure. Here he defended himself vigorously, but his provisions failing him, he took advantage of a fubterraneous back way which he had caufed to be digged up for that purpose, and taking his immense treasure with him.

Pole away as fecretly as he could. His flight, however, was foon discovered; and he was so closely pursued, that to amuse, as he hoped, the enemy, he caused a great deal of his money, plate, jewels, &c. to be feattered all the way, thinking they would not fail to ftop their purfait to gather it up. This stratagem, however, failed, through the vigilence of the Spanish commander, who, being himself at the head of the purfuers, obliged them to march on, till he was come up close to him on the banks of the Huenda, about eight leagues from Tremecen. Barbaroffa had just croffed the river with his van guard, when the Spaniards came up with his rear on the other fide, and cut them all off; and then crofling the water, overtook him at a small distance from it. Here a bloody engagement ensued, in which the Turks fought like as many lions; but being at length overpowered by numbers, they were all cut to pieces, and Barbaroffa among the reft, in the forty-fourth year of his age, and four years after he had raifed himfelf to the royal title of Jigel, and the adjacent country; two years after he had acquired the fovereignty of Algiers, and scarce a twelve month after the reduction of Tremecen. His head was carried to Tremecen on the point of a fpear; and Abuchen Men proclaimed King, to the joy of all the inhabitants. A few days after the fight, the King of Fez made his appearance at the head of 20,000 horse, near the held of battle; but hearing of Barbaroffa's defeat and death, marched off with all poffible speed, to avoid being attacked by the enemy.

The news of Barbarossa's death spread the utmost confernation among the Turks at Algiers; however they caused his brother Hayradin to be proclaimed King. The Spanish commander now sent back the Emperor's forces, without making any attempt upon Algiers; by which he lost the opportunity of driving the Turks out of that country; while Hayradin justly dreading the consequences of the tyranny of his officers, sought the protection of the Grand Signior. This was readily granted, and himself appointed Bashaw, or Viceroy of Algiers; by which means he received such considerable reinforcements, that the unhappy Algerines durft not make the least complaint; and such numbers of Turks reforted to him, that he was not only capable of keeping the Moors and Arabs in subjection at home, but of annoying the Christians at sea. His first step was to take the Spanish fort abovementioned, which was a great nuifance to his metropolis. The Spaniards held out to the last extremity; but being all sain or wounded, Hayradin easily became master of the place.

MEMOIRS OF THE LATE QUEEN OF FRANCE.

From the LADY'S POCKET MAGAZINE,

Printed in London, August 1795.

HE unfortunate Maria Antoinetta, illustrious confort of the equally unfortunate Louis XVI. King of France, was fifter to the late Emperor of Germany. They were married while Louis was Dauphin; and, on their accession to the throne, were idolized by the people, for that mild condefcenfion of marmers, which induced them to forego much of the etiquette of royalty, and mingle familiarly with their Subjects. The Queen, in particular, a beautiful young woman, the pride of the house of Austria, launched too precipitately into the vortex of pleasure; consulting less the dignity of her exalted fituation, than the vain gratification of a perpetual thirst after gaiety, and those frivolous amusements which, in time, enervate the noblest hearts, and fap the foundations of the sternest virtue. A momentous lesion, this, to the fovereigns of Europe! who might expect fimilar effects to refult from fimilar causes; and a no lefs falutary caution to the subordinate ranks of society, who are not likely to escape unhurt, by the inordinate defire of feeking a meretricious felicity, in those flowery paths of pleasure where lurk the concealed serpents, whose deadly fangs have so unpityingly lacerated royalty.

How far this ill-fated Queen was led to transgress the bounds of decorum, we have no materials on which we can roly, that enable us to judge. The fabrications of the many gross calumnies published against her caracter by the most deprayed of the human species, bear internal evidence of the vileness and atrocity of their outhors; whose detestable minds are capable of the most diabolical suggestions, and who are therefore not entitled to the smallest degree of credibility. In the relaxed morals of the court of France, and the seminine degeneracy and dissipation of the whole nation, we have probably the true causes of all the misery with which that devoted country has been overwhelmed.

The Queen certainly degraded herfelf by emulating opera performers; and by fuffering those to become her companions who were of reproachable characters. It is fufficient for virtue, if the pities, but the ought never to countenance vice. It is probable, however, that a mere excess of good-nature impelled the Queen to affociate with those whom she found it necessary to consult respecting her favourite fetes and other trivial amusements. She sought to fecure happiness for herself; the fought to diffuse it among the people: but, unhappily, the fought it not, folely, in that tranquil and retired path of domestick virtue, where all that is to be met with on earth can alone be found; in the pure affection of a beloved hulband, and in the chafte endearments of a lovely and innocent offspring, training up to piety and virtue. This feems to have been the grand error of her life. She loved her husband, and she loved her children: but fought not, in their fociety alone, her chief happinefs.

There are various well-authenticated anecdotes of the Queen's feeling and humanity; of the many grofs and indelicate charges against her, there feems no one positive proof. On her true character, therefore, the page of the suture historian must decide; when prejudices shall have been mowed down by the scythe of time; and when even the friendly pity for her sufferings, which must long fill every virtuous bosom, and render humid every eye, at the shocking recital, shall sufficiently subside, to yield Truth the power of giving the sad tale faithfully to posterity. In the mean time, we make no foruple to affect, that the charges under which both herself and her august confort were condemned to the ignominious death they so shamefully suffered, constituted the vilest mockery of justice that ever was exhibited among a people pretending to the smallest degree of civilization: and, that nothing against her morals was exhibited, on her trial, except the impracticable story respecting her insent son, a child scarcely eight years of age, and which no human being ever believed, is a most powerful argument in savour of the Queen's actual virtue.

After suffering a long and cruel imprisonment; having seen a beloved husband led to the scassfold; been deprived of the sole remaining consolation by a brutal separation from her children, and insulted by the solemn mockery of a public trial; she was beheaded, at Paris, on Wednesday the fixteenth of October 1793, being in her 38th year. The corpse of the ill-stated Queen was immediately buried in a grave filled with quick-lime, in the church-yard called De la Madelaine, where her unfortunate consort, Louis XVI. had been before deposited and consumed in the same manner.

The Princess Maria Theresa Charlotta, their eldest child, born the 19th of December 1778, still languishes in prison, at Paris; without having h.d the consolation to see, even for a moment, her dying brother, the late Dauphin, who was born March 27, 1785, and laid down his miserable life, generally supposed to have been shortened by poison, and certainly by sufferings too great for his tender years, on the 18th of June 1795.

La FONTAINE.

AMONGST the whole human race, there does not appear to have been a person so innocent and so distract as this incomparable writer was. He does not appear to have had common fense, except when he was writing. His confessor, on his death-bed, found him so exceedingly ignorant of what all men are concerned to know, that he almost menaced him with perdition. The old nurse, however, who heard this denunciation, said, "Dieu affurement n'aura pas la cœur de le damner."—" Sure God has not the heart to damn him." His serious poems are very little looked into now, and there is one of them pretty considerable, in the book by the French called Quinquira, addressed to the Duchess of Hamilton, Cardinal Mazarine's niece.

Sir JOHN TABER, Knt.

WAS an apothecary's apprentice at Cambridge, and was taught by Ray, the naturalist, the method of administering that divine remedy the bark. He was fent for to Paris by Louis XIV. to give it to his fon the Grand Dauphin, who had long been ill of an ague. The French physicians did not, however, chuse to permit Taber to prescribe for their royal patient, till he had given them a regular and philosophical description of an ague. "An ague, gentlemen," said he, "is a disorder that I can cure and you cannot." Louis ordered him to administer his remedy to his son, who immediately recovered. Louis gave Taber two thousand louis d'ors, and our Charles the Second created him a knight. The derivation of the word ague has puzzled many persons. It comes from the Saxon word agin, to tremble; in that language, agis is fear.

PATRU.

OUR anecdote-mongers are apt to attend very much to what passes in the last moments of the lives of those perfons of whom they collect the incidents and bon mots. What Patru, the celebrated French lawyer, said at that awful period, should in some degree repress their ardour in that respect. Patru was supposed throughout life to have been a Sceptic. Bossuet, the bishop of Meaux, (le grand Convertiseur) as he was sometimes called, waited upon him in his last illness, and told him, that as the world had in general taken him for an Esprit fort, it might be, perhaps, right for him to undeceive the world, by making his confession of faith, and by saying something that might edify them, whom he, perhaps, had before scandalized. "Alas, my lord," replied he, "it is much better that I should say nothing. In my situation, in general, no one speaks but from weakness or vanity." "Il est plus a propos, monfeigneur, que je me taile." On ne parle dans ces moments ordinairement que par soiblesse ou par vanite."

MARGARET of Valois,

IRST wife of Henry the Fourth, of France. This beautiful princefs, with as much wit and learning as Margaret de Navarre, had lefs conduct; for when her brother, Charles the Ninth, gave her in marriage to Henry, he jokingly faid. " J'ai donne ma sceur en marriage a tous les Huguenots de moi Rusaume."-She was at Paris on the accurred day of St. Bartholomew, and faved a poor Huguenot officer from being murdered, who had fled for refuge into her bedchamber. Of this the gives a very particular account in the memoirs which the wrote of her life, and which upluckily the never finished. The style of her memoirs is that vieux Gouloss, that old French, that we admire fo much in Amyot, the celebrated translator of Plutarch. She appears to have studied Amyot's style with great attention. She lived upon ill terms with Henry, and was confined by him for a long time, in one of the fortreffes of Navarre. She thus exactly describes the effects of calamity and solistude upon her mind; "I received," fays fhe, " thefe two good fruits from my misfortunes and my confinement; the one, that I got a tafte for fludy; the other, that I gave into devotion: two things for which I foould never have had the least talle, had I continued amongst the pomps and yaVIII.

nities of the world. For these, perhaps, I am not so much to thank fortune as providence, that was kind enough to procure for me such an excellent remedy, against the evils that were to happen to me in future. Sorrow," adds she, "contrary to gaiety, (which carries out of us our thoughts and our actions) makes the mind rally within itself and exert its whole powers to reject the evil and to feek after the good, in hopes to find out that sovereign and supreme good, which is the readiest way to bring itself to the knowledge and love of the Deity."

BERTAUD.

How many persons in the world may say with this elegant writer,

Felicité passée Que ne peut revinir Lourment de ma pensée

Que n'ai je en te perdant, terdu le souvenir.

Ah! pleasure past, that never can return,

O how thou still torments my aching brain!

Into oblivion quick, O quick return,

And let not memory increase the pain.

Cardinal RICHLIEU,

ON receiving the present of a book from Le Jay, he wrote in it, "Accepi, legi, probavi. Card. Richelius." A favourite maxim of this great man was, that, in general, an unfortunate and an imprudent person were synonymous terms; this will be true nineteen times out of twenty. Whoever will have the honesty to descend into his own breast, and scrutinize himself fairly, will in general find, that most of his own misfortunes have been owing to his folly, his raftness, his conceit, or his neglect of taking proper measures, that his own consideration, or the advice of others, might have suggested to him.

MAXIMILIAN.

THIS emperor, who was called Poco Desare, from his being ever in want of mercy, used to say, that he entertained that high opinion of the power and resources of France, even in his time, under Louis XII. that were he the Deity, he would make his eldest son the Deity, and give to his second son the kingdom of France. Frederie the Second, of Prussia, used to say, that the height of his ambition would be to have a kingdom like that of France, in extent and variety of territory, in situation and climate, in soil and in population, to govern. How wonderful indeed, even in their present state of tumult and distraction, do their powers of resource appear.

Madame DACIER,

W AS defired by a German prince to write a fentence in his Album, as a memorial of the vifit that he had paid to a woman of her great learning. She modefully wrote in it, from Euripides,

" Silence is the greatest ornament of a woman."

SCRAPIANA.

THAT eloquent prelate, Jeremy Taylor, in speaking of marriage, breaks out with this rapturous description of it, not inferior to the celebrated apostrophe of J. J. Rousseau, "Femme, semme!"—"Mental love is a thing as pure as light, sacred as a temple, lasting as the world. That love that can cease, as said an ancient, was never true. Mental love contains in it all sweetness, all society, all selicity, all prudence, and all wisdom. It is an union of all things excellent; it contains proportion, satisfaction, rest, and considence. The eyes of a wife are then," says this elegant and learned writer, "fair as the light of heaven; a man may then case his cares, and lay down his forrows upon her lap, and can retire home as to his sanctuary and refectory, and his gardens of sweetness and of chaste resreshment."—This passage reminds one of an anecdote that is told of Peter the Great, czar of Russia. He was a man of a most savage and serocious temper; and when he became angry, his eyes slashed fire, and his whole frame was convulsed: yet no sooner did his lovely empress Catharine appear, than he used to throw himself at her seet, and lay his head in her lap. Under the pressure of her soft and heautiful hands, the throbbing of his temples ceased, and he immediately became calm and composed.

Man, fays Pascal, is neither an angel or a beast; and the missortune is, that he that pretends to be the angel, must be always the beast.

Aftrologers and alchymists have certain principles, says Pascal, but they abuse them. The abuse of truth, adds he, ought in justice to be as severely punished, as the admission of a falsehood.

Adversity has the same effects upon different minds, that water has upon different bodies; some it hardens, others it softens.

Who can suppose man naturally virtuous, when in every country in the universe there are laws and religion to restrain his actions, and to amend his disposition.

We are all flaves to the law that we may become free, fays Tully. Indeed where there is no law, there can be no liberty. That licence which every one would arrogate to himfelf, would very foon deftroy itfelf. Men, according to Goldfmith, are but too apt

"To call it freedom, when themselves are free."
That is, mankind naturally like to do as they please themselves, and to debar all other persons from that privilege.

Vol. I -No. i.

The very defire of a good name is virtue, fays Gracion. Cato the Cenfor used to fay, that no one would be virtuous, if glory was separated from virtue. So Juvenal,

-Quis virtutem amplectitur iplam

Præmia fi tollos.

Propriety is the test of excellence, even in virtue itself.

The Spanish proverb says, "Be upon your guard against that man who does but one thing." That is, he must know it so superiorly well, that if you have any concern with him, respecting it, he is likely to be far above your match.

Another Spanish proverb against cunning is very excellent. "That man is a fool who does not consider, that whilst he is thinking, a thousand other persons are thinking too."

How very little is to be decided refpecting the characters of men from the last moments of their lives. Many pious and good persons have left the world in agonies and terrors, whilst many vicious and dissolute men have died with great calmness. Pericles, of Athens, of all men perhaps the least superstitious, and who, during a long and active live, had ever appeared to be master of himself, on his death-bed shewed a friend a charm that had been put upon his breast. "See," said he, "to what I have come; the women have made me do this." Patru was desired by the great Bossuet, on his death-bed, to undeceive the world, respecting some free opinions he was supposed to have entertained. "Ah, monseigneur," replied he, "dans les derniers moments, ou parle le plus souvenent par soiblesse ou par vanite."

In most disputes, do we not first take the fide, and afterwards fit the arguments to it?

Vain persons had much rather go wrong their own way, than go right in that of another person.

Vanity is not often cured by frequency of disappointment. It seems almost like Anteus, to rise from the blows it receives. Its disappointment seems like medicines in certain constitutions, they exacerbate the disease which they ought to cure.

A man fays Montesquieu, with infinite descernment, is never to be totally given up till he keeps bad company. A man may occasionally be guilty of a vice or a folly, and there is an end; it does not seem to penetrate his soul, or sink into his bosom; it is transitory, not habitual.

Cardinal Imperiali used to say, that Fortune called upon every man once in his life; but if she did not then find him at home, she never afterwards repeated her visit.

"What a hard thing it is," fays fome Frenchmen, "that one may not fay to a tirefome man in converfation, You fatigue me." Were that but permitted, an end would be foon put to great and impertinent talkers. Dorat used to fay to any man who forewarned him, that he would tell him a story; "Upon my honour, Sir, but you shall not;" and run out of the room.

A very thin and feeble man, but an inceffant talker, once confulted the prefent illustrious father of physic in England, and wished to know what was the cause of his complaint. "My good friend, you appear to me to talk too much," was the reply.

Great talkers are in general very small thinkers. They talk very often, if one may so express it, to assure us that they have nothing to say.

Hefiod, the ancient Greek poet, has thus classed mankind into those that are wise enough to think for themselves, into those that are prudent enough to let other persons think for them, and into those whom he calls useless persons, who are neither wise enough to think for themselve, nor prudent enough to let others think for them. May not the sentiment be thus described?

He, 'mongst his fellows, has the highest place, The pride and honour of the human race, Who in his own great comprehensive mind, Can ev'ry fource of bright instruction find, Knows all the paft, and can with eagle eye Pierce the recesses of futurity; Nor whilst such objects own his mental pow'r, Neglects the bulinels of the present hour. The next is he, who bleft with modest fense, To no superior talents makes pretence; Can fee what men his veneration claim, And lights his torch from their more vivid flame; Their counsel takes, their minds to his combines, And modest by reslected lustre shines. The next a fad and ufeless race on earth, To nought or good or glorious giving birth; Who ignorantly or perverfely wrong, Deaf to each eloquence of pen or tongue, The bard's high rapture eyes with cold difdain, And hears the fage his wisdom pour in vain: History for them unheeded opes the page, Fraught with the experience of many an age; And Disappointment's felf but idly tries To clear the film from their diforder'd eyes.

Xenophon, in speaking of the language of Athens, reminds one very much of that of England, as he says, the Athenians hear every kind of language spoken amongst them. They have adopted an expression from one or the other of them, as they have thought sit; and whilst the rest of the Grecians preserve scrupulously their particular idiom, manners, and customs, the Athenians have made a happy mixture of what they have sound most perfect amongst the barbarians, as well as amongst their own countrymen.

Buffy de Rabutine fays very comically of love attachments in persons of a certain age, that love is like the small-pox; the later you have it in life, in general, the more violent and dangerous it is. Ovid says prettily, Turpe fenex miles. Turpe fenilis amor. Grey hairs but ill become the foldier's arms, Nor with more credit yield to beauty's charms.

MISCELLANY.

OF THE STATE OF THE FINE ARTS AT ATHENS.

BY MR. DE PAUW.

I. Painting; and the Venus of Cos, and of Gnidus.

AMONG the Greeks, the genius of one man has often effected more than all the efforts of the multitude; and as Homer was the father of epic poetry, fo did historical painting originate with Polygnotus. This art had hitherto produced nothing capable of pleafing the eye, but with him it began to acquire the magical power of fpeaking even to the heart.

Polygnotus, as an original artift, deserves more confideration than all those who have followed his sootsteps; and we shall, therefore, endeavour to point out his many excellencies, as well as faults, of which likewise he had no small share. Yet the force of his imagination stamped painting with a kind of national character; and his manner was perpetuated among the principal schools of Greece, in the same way that all the compositions of versifiers partook more or less of the style and colouring of Homer.

This great master, born in the island of Thasos, about five hundred years before our æra, was at first uncertain as to his destiny, and did not know whether nature had intended him for a poet or a painter. He began, therefore, by studying not only the Islad and Odyssey, but likewise all the epic poems then extant, such as the Minyad, the Islustrious Woman, the Return from Hell, and many others, where sufficient mythological subjects were found, to adorn all the temples and porticos of Europe and Asia. It was then Polygnotus, sensible of his vocation, undertook to give bodies and colours to the ideas of the poets. The taking of Troy was the favourite scene he represented at Athens, Delphi, and most probable in many other parts of Greece

That event, for ever memorable, contained fo many interesting circumstances, and such terrible situations, that it feems almost impossible to combine or unite them. But no obstacles could check the enthusiasm of this artist, who sometimes introduced more than eighty sigures into one picture, and raised himself as if by magic, to such lostly ideas and sublime conceptions, that they fill the mind with astonishment. An action, unfortunately but too frequent at that time in all towns taken by assault, afforded him the most difficult task that ever presented itself to the imagination of man. He dared to paint Cassandra, the daughter of Priam, at the moment she had been violated by Ajax in the temple of Minerva: a veil partly covered the face of this unfortunate captive; but the blush of consuson was visible on her front, and she discovered all the symptoms of modesty, insulted by a monster who has been called a hero.

The Athenians were charmed with this picture above every thing, and they could not sufficiently admire the happy conception and judgment displayed in surmounting so many difficulties; but one circumstance more than the rest fixed their attention. Under the sicitious name of Laodice, he had introduced a very beautiful semale figure, totally unconnected either with the siege of Troy, or any historical events relative to his subject: and this was called by the Greek artists a Parergon, or digression. As the Athenians had great penetration, they soon discovered in this stranger the samous Elpinice, daughter of Miltiades, and the beloved sister of Cimon, who had brought Polygnotus to Athens, after having conquered the island of Thasios, in the year four hundred and sixty-three before our tera.

When the mystery became known, the moralists of Athens decided that Elpinice had exceeded the limits of modesty, by exposing herself to the eyes of the painter as a model, most probably; for all the semale sigures of the piece; and even for that of Cassandra, although, indeed, it did not appear that she had been ravished. But, previous to this censure, they should have considered, that from the great scarcity of sine forms in Greece, the painters could seldom find any sufficiently perfect for their purpose.

We are informed by Cicero, that in the town of Crotona, which, according to fome historians, contained upwards of one hundred thousand inhabitants, Zeuxis could not find any woman at all qualified to be the model for a picture of Helen, intended to be placed in the temple of Juno, on the promontory of Lacinium. He had therefore no other resource than to copy the individual beauties of five different virgins, in order to form his ideal figure; and this production, when completed, was far from answering the great expectations it had raised. The Helen of Zeuxis, although admired by some artists, never attracted the multitude; but the Cassandra of Polygnotus preserved the greatest reputation even in the days of Lucian.

The difficulty of finding beautiful objects among the women of Greece, must have been very great indeed, when Praxiteles and Apelles were obliged to have recourse to the same person for the charms of the Venus of Gnidus, executed in white marble, and the Venus of Cos, drawn in colours. It is afferted by Athenæus, who was much better informed on this point than Pliny the naturalist, that both these same productions, the picture, as well as the statue, were copied after the courtesan Phryne, who, born at Thespia in Bæotia, had exercised her empire at Athens. After having studied several attitudes, she fancied to have discovered one more savourable than the rest for displaying all her bodily persections. Both painter and sculptor were obliged to adopt her savourite posture, while she tyranized over the eyes of the one, and the soul of the other.

From this cause, the Venus of Gnidus, and the Venus of Cos, were so perfectly alike, that it was impossible to remark any difference in their features, contour, or more particularly in their attitude. Both represented Phryne coming out of the sea, on the beach of Sciron, where she was wont to bathe in the Saronic gulf, between Athens and Eleuss. But the painting of Apelles was far from exciting so much enthusiasm among the Greeks as the sculpture of Praxiteles. They fancied the marble moved; that it seemed to speak; and their illusion, says Lucian, was so great, thet they ended by applying their lips to those of the goddes. Authology, likewise, contained a far greater number of verses in honour of the Venus of Gnidus, than were ever produced by the admirers of the Venus of Cos.

'Since that period, the triumph of sculpture over painting has been decided: and it is not dishcult to prove by physical reasons, that the one of these arts must be superior to the other, when the artists, as in the present case, are equal in talents and genius.

It is, however, but just to observe, that the gentle bending of the body, and charming inflexion of the arms, assumed by Phryne, afforded the greatest advantages to the sculptor, and were altogether unfavourable for the painter, who was thus subjected to the imperious will of a model, too animated for his pencil.

To form a more extensive idea of the manner of Polygnotus, it is necessary to return to that portico called the Poecile, which contained examples of the association boldness of his composition.

Next to the taking of Troy was feen the battle of Marathon, where he allowed himfelf more licence than ever Pindar ventured to exercife in a lyric poem. Minerva and Hercules were made to defeend from heaven; the small town of Marathon was personified in the form of a genius; and the first Anachronism took place there that ever appeared in painting. Theseus, drawn from the shades of death, had to witness a combat some centuries after his decease.

This was exactly the same thing, as representing Clovis at the battle of Fontenoi, or Charlemain at the siege of Gibraltar; and he rendered the licence more conspicuous by marking on the picture the names of the different figures in capital letters. Miltiades and his colleagues, however, were not distinguished in that manner, because it must have rendered them too illustrious not to excite the jealousy of the Athenian citizens, who had fought with as much bravery as the chiefs of the army.

The introduction of written characters to indicate great personages, demonstrates clearly, that Polygnotus, without any idea whatever of perspective, had ranged his figures in winding lines from the bottom of the picture to the very top of the sky. This must always have been the case, when a group contained forty or fifty personages; for the Greeks knew nothing of any other polition, as appears by that famous bas-relief, commonly called the Apotheolis of Homer, where the figures of the first rank have their names also inserted, and are placed exactly on the same plan with hose of Polygnotus.

From this it follows, of course, that the Greek painters always appeared to greatest advantage in representing some single object, unconnected with any of the rules of perspective. The pictures most generally admired by the vulgar, as well as by enlightened judges, like the Jalyses of Protogenes, the Venus of Apeiles, and the Glycera of Pausias, were all of this description.

It is aftonishing that the moderns should have lost so much time in conjectures, and obstinate disputes concerning the knowledge of the ancients in perspective: when the Greeks themselves have acknowledged their desciency in that point. No artist of those days ever attempted to paint a landscape, or if he did make the essay, we require no other proof of its being unsuccessful, than, that his name is forgotten.

In reading a description of mount Hymettus, we are struck with the admirable points of view in different parts of Attica and Peloponnesus; but the citadel of Corinth excelled all others for extent of prospect, variety of objects, and successive deepenings even to the very foot of mount Parnassus. Although a country like this, abounding in picturesque scenes, enriched with monuments of architecture, and ornamented with facred groves, fountains, and cafcades, feemed calculated to invite the pencil, yet no artist there ever attached himself to landscape. The language of the Greeks had no word to express that species of painting; for the term chorography belonging folely to the science of geographers. Neither did their technical Dictionary contain any thing analogous to sea-pieces founded on arial perspective, of which they were likewise ignorant, as appears by all the monuments of Herculaneum. To authorities of this nature it would be abfurd to oppose the affertions of fuch a writer as Philostratus, whose book called the Images, is the production of a fophist entirely ignorant of the elements of painting.

We are informed by the ancients themselves that their optics consisted of three parts; the first taught architects how to distribute the entrances and windows of a building to greatest advantage; the second respected mirrors; and the third, called seenography, belonged chiefly to theatrical decorations. The great art of the latter consisted in arranging the ornaments so as to prevent one illusion from injuring another.

Linear perspective, as practised by painters, we may be assured was not contained in the elements of ancient optics; otherwise the productions found in Herculaneum would not have trespassed so grossly against all the rules of art, both in the points where the lines should terminate, and in the aspect of objects. They were often represented as seen from below, when, according to their position, the real view was from above.

ETHELGAR.

A SAXON STORY.

IS not for thee, O man! to murmer at the will of the Almighty. When the thunders roar, the lightnings shine on the rifing waves, and the black clouds fit on the brow of the lofty hill; who then protects the flying deer, fwift as a fable cloud, toft by the whiftling winds, leaping over the rolling floods, to gain the hoary wood, whilft the lightnings thine on his cheft, and the wind rides over his horns? When the wolf roars, terrible as the voice of the Severn, moving majeftic as the nodding forests on the brow of Michel-flow; who then commands the sheep to follow the Iwain, as the beams of light attend upon the morning?" Know, O man! that God fuffers not the least member of his work to perith, without answering the purpose of their creation. The evils of life, with fome, are bleffings; and the plant of death healeth the wound of the fword. Doth the fea of trouble and affliction overwhelm thy foul? look unto the Lord; thou shalt stand firm in the days of temptation, as the lofty hill of Kinwulf; in vain shall the waves beat against thee, thy rock shall stand.

Comely as the white rocks, bright as the flar of the evening, tall as the oak upon the brow of the mountain, foft as the showers of dew that fall upon the flowers of the field, Ethelgar arose, the glory of Exanceastre*. Noble were his ancestors, as the palace of the great Kenrick. His foul with the lark, every morning afcended the fkies, and sported in the clouds. When stealing down the steep mountain, wrapt in a shower of spangling dew, evening came creeping to the plain; closing the flowers of the day, shaking her pearly showers upon the rustling trees; then was his voice heard in the grove, as the voice of the nightingale upon the hawthorn-spray. He sung the works of the Lord; the hollow rocks joined in his devotions, the stars danced to his fong. The rolling years, in various mentles dreft, confest him man. He faw Egwina of the Vale; his foul was aftonished, as the Britons who fled before the fword of Kenrick. She was tall as the towering elm, stately as a black cloud bursting into thunder: fair as the wrought bowels of the earth; gentle, and fweet, as the morning breeze; beauteous, as the fun; blushing, like the vines of the west; her foul, as fair as the azure curtain of heaven. She faw Ethelgar; her foft foul melted, as the flying fnow before the fun. The shrine of St. Cuthbert united them; the minutes fled on the golden wings of blifs. Nine horned moons had decked the fky, when Algar faw the light. He was like a young plant upon the mountain's fide, or the fun hid in a cloud: he felt the strength of his fire; and swift as the lightnings of beaven, purfued the wild boar of the wood. The morn awoke the fun; who stepping from the mountain's brow, shook his ruddy locks upon the shining dew: Ælgar arose from fleep; he feized his fword and spear, and issued to the chace. As waters fwiftly falling down a craggy rock, fo raged young Algar through the wood; the wild boar bit his spear, and the fox died at his feet. From the thicket a wolf arose, his eyes slaming like two stars. He roared like the voice of a tempest: hunger made him surious; and he sled, like a falling meteor, to the war. Like a thunder-bolt tearing a black rock, Ælgar darted his spear through his heart. The wolf raged like the voice of many waters; and seizing Ælgar by the throat, he sought the regions of the blessed!—The wolf died upon his body.—Ethelgar and Egwina wept—they wept like the rains of the spring: forrow sat upon them as the black clouds upon the mountains of death; but the power of God settled their hearts.

The golden fun role to the highest of his power; the apple perfumed the gale; and the juicy grape delighted the eye. Ethelgar and Egwina bent their way to the mountain's fide, like two flars that move through the fky. The flowers grew beneath their feet; the trees spread out their leaves; the fun played upon the rolling brook; the winds gently passed along. Dark, pitchy clouds, veiled the face of the fun; the winds roared like the noise of a battle; the fwift hail descended to the ground; the lightnings broke from the fable clouds, and gilded the dark-brown corners of the fky; the thunder shook the lofty mountains; the tall towers nodded to their foundations; the bending oaks divided the whiftling wind; the broken flowers fled in confusion round the mountain's fide. Ethelger and Egwina fought the facred shade; the bleak winds roared over their heads, and the waters ran over their feet. Swift from the dark cloud the lightning came; the skies blushed at the light. Egwina flood on the brow of the lofty hill, like an oak in the fpring; the lightnings danced about her garments, and the blafting flame blackened her face. The shades of death swam before her eyes; and she fell breathless down the black steep rock; the sea received her body, and the rolled down with the roaring water.

Ethelgar flood terrible as the mountain of Maindip. The waves of despair harrowed up his soul, as the roaring Severn plows the sable tand: wild as the evening wolf, his eyes shone like the red vapours in the valley of the dead; herror set upon his brow. Like a bright star shooting through the sky, he plunged from the lofty brow of the hall; like a tall oak, breaking from the roaring wind. Sc.

Cuthbert appeared in the air. The black clouds fled from the fky; the fun gilded the spangled meadows; the lofty pine flood still; the violets of the vale gently moved to the fost voice of the wind; the fun shone on the bubbling brook. The faint, arrayed in glory, caught the falling mortal: as the foft dew of the morning hangs upon the lofty elm, he bore him to the fandy beach, whilft the fea roared beneath his feet. Ethelgar opened his eyes, like the grey orbs of the morning folding up the black mantle of the night .- ' Know, O man !' faid the member of the bleffed, 'to fubmit to the will of God! He is terrible, as the face of the earth, when the waters funk to their habitations; gentle, as the facred covering of the oak; fecret, as the bottom of the great deep; just, as the rays of the morning. Learn that thou art a man, nor repine ' at the stroke of the Almighty; for God is as just as he is great.' The holy vision disappeared, as the atoms fly before the fun. Ethelgar arose, and bent his way to the college of Kenewalçin; there he flourishes, as a hoary oak in the wood of Arden.

Alas! Sir, have you feen my child?—The perfon who thus answered me, was a poor blind man, seated on the trunk of a hollow tree, at the foot of which issued a filver spring; his bald forehead, robbed of its honours by the iron hand of time; his patched wallet, unconscious of the bounties of Ceres; his hickory staff on which he rested his debilitated arm; his body, that seemed fainting under the pressure of extreme hunger; his sightless eyes, and tremulous voice; altogether struck me with a kind of reverential horror.—I looked once more upon the object which had so rivetted my amazement, and thought that providence had deserted one of her weaked children:—The

For these ten years past my being has been comfortless (said the poor old man, pointing to the place where his eyes once were); for these ten years past I have been praying for my diffolution: many miferable wretches, who were doomed to wander through the darkfome caverns of affliction, have hope at least to strengthen them upon their journey; but my expectations of mortal blifs are over."-

"You must not loose fight of hope, my good old man; it is possible you may yet be happy."-" Happy !-ah! dear Sir, circumstanced as I am, even to expect such an event were prefumption."--" You are not certain, my poor friend, but affistance may be near you in the moment of complaining."-" Affiftance! I entreat, Sir, mock not my misfortunes; can the power of kings give me a ray of. light?"-- This answer struck me so forcibly, that I immediately turned towards the fun, and could not help attering a filent prayer of gratitude to the Deity, that I was in possession of so invaluable a gift. He remained silent for a moment, resting his hands upon his staff, and bending his palfied head towards the earth, which feemed, in the melancholy state of my understanding at that period, to call him to her bosom; then iffuing a woe-fraught figh, continued-" Oh! my daughter! my dear child! but for her goodness I should long since have ceased to exist; when I determined to suppress my being, and die by the slow hand of hunger-the poor child cries-embraces my nerveless knees-calls me her father-her dear her honoured father, in a tone of supplication so persuasive, and so tender, that the influence of desperation yields to the entreaties of an angel; and yet fhe does not return! Ah! Rofa, wilt thou leave me here to perish without the confolation of a last embrace-without the rapture of bestowing my final bleffing on my child?-O, my God! doft thou then abandon me !"---

The awful manner in which he uttered these words chilled the very pulses of my heart.—I listed my streaming eyes to heaven, and murmured involuntarily—God of nature! is it possible thou can'st have abandoned him!—

The poor man thanked me, and I retired laden with anguish.—I had wandered some distance from the miserable man, when I perceived his daughter; I ran to announce the discovery to her father—I would not have exchanged the commission to have been sovereign of the world. His greedy ear drank the intelligence with rapture, and the good old man was cheered once more with a moment of joy. His daughter arrived out of breath—she had been far away, begging charity for her unhappy father; I looked as the amiable Rosa with unutterable delight; —— I thought her countenance was more than human; —— she uttered the sentiments of filial piety in so graceful a manner, that pity, admiration, and respect, at once usurped the government of my bosom.

I felt a delicious emotion in perceiving, with what undescribable tenderness the poor old man and his daughter embraced each other.—Oh! Rousseau!—Oh! Yorick! if such a scene was to pass near your tombs, would you not burst from the cold monument of death, to celebrate the virtues of the exemplary Rofa!

"Is it thee my dearest Rosa;—is it thee?" said the aged father, stretching out his withered hands, which seemed to seek the fond object of his regards with sympathetic agency;—"where art thou Rosa? let me press thee to my panting heart; you tarried so long, that I almost began to think you had for saken me."—Rosa instantly kissed the trembling forehead of her parent, and wetted his silver locks with the tears of affection.

"I knew, my dear child—I well knew, that thou wouldst return;—come near me, that I may embrace thee once more."——"You will never defert this old man again; but constantly watch by his side, to soften the pangs of affliction."——"Ah! Sir," replied the lovely girl, "do you not know."——"What, Rosa?"—" that he is my father!"——What a sentiment!—could volumes express more!——Ye parents, who boast of educating your children agreeable to the principles of Christianity, bid them read this tale.

rant intended most peremptorily to refuse, by granting it, as he conceived, on the impossible condition of his procuring some one to remain as hostage for his return under equal forfeiture of life. Pythias heard the condition, and did not wait for an application on the part of Damon. He instantly offered himself to confinement in place of his friend, and Damon was accordingly set at liberty.

The king, and all his courtiers, were aftonished at this action, as they could not account for it on any allowed principles. Self-interest, in their judgment, was the sole principles. Self-interest, in their judgment, was the sole follower of human assairs: and they looked on virtue, friend-ship, benevolence, love of country, and the like, as terms invented by the wise, to impose upon the weak. They, therefore, imputed this act of Pythias to the extravagance of his folly; to a defect, of understanding merely, and, no way, to any virtue, or good quality of heart.

When the day of the destined execution drew near, the tyrant had the curiofity to vifit Pythias in his dungeon.-Having reproached him for the extravagance of his conduct, and rallied him some time on his madness, in prefuming that Damon, by his return, would prove as romantic as himfelf-" My lord," faid Pythias, with a firm voice, and noble aspect, " I would it were possible, that I might fuffer a thousand deaths, rather than my friend should fail in any article of his honour. He cannot fail therein, my lord. I am as confident of his virtue, as I am of my own existence. But I pray, I befeech the gods, to preserve the life and integrity of my Damon together. Oppose him ye winds! prevent the eagerness and impatience of his honourable endeavours; and fuffer him not to arrive, till, by my death I have redeemed a life, a thoufand times of more confequence, of more estimation, than my own; more estimable to his lovely wife, to his precious little innocents, to his friends, to his country. O! leave me not to die the worst of deaths in my Damon." Dionysius was awed and counfounded by the dignity of these sen iments, and by the manner, still more affecting, in which they were uttered He felt his heart ftruck by a flight fense of invading truth; but it served rather to perplex than undeceive him. He hesitated. He would have spoken. But he looked down; and retired in silence.

The fatal day arrived. Pythias was brought forth; and walked, amidft the guard, with a ferious, but fatisfied air, to the place of execution. Dionysius was already there. He was exalted on a moving throne drawn by fix white horses, and sat pensive and attentive to the demeanour of the prifoner. Pythias came. He vaulted lightly on the fcaffold, and, beholding for fome time the apparatus of death, he turned, and, with a pleasing countenance, thus addressed the assembly. "My prayers are heard. The gods are propitious. You know, my friends, that the winds have been contrary till yesterday. Damon could not come : he could not conquer impossibilities He will be here to-morrow; and the blood which is shed to-day, shall have ransomed the life of my friend. O! could I erafe from your bosoms every doubt, every mean suspicion of the honour of the man for whom I am about to fuffer, I should go to my death, even as I would to my bridal. Be it sufficient, in the mean time, that my friend will be found noble—that his truth is unimpeachable—that he will speedily approve it-that he is now on his way, hurrying on, accusing himself, the adverse elements, and the gods. But I hasten to prevent his speed .- Executioner, do your office." As he pronounced the last words, a buzz began to arise among the remotest of the people. A distant voice was heard. The crowd caught the words; and "Stop, Rop the execution," was repeated by the whole affembly. A man came at full fpeed. The throng gave way to his approach. He was mounted on a fleed of foam. In an instant he was off his horse, on the scaffold, and held Pythias straitly embraced. "You are fafe," he cried; " you are fafe, my friend, my beloved! the gods be praised, you are fafe! I, now, have nothing but death to fuffer; and I am delivered from the anguish of those reproaches, which I gave myfelf, for having endangered a life fo much dearer than my own." Pale, and almost speechless, in the arms of his Damon, Pythias replied, in broken accents, " Fatal hafte !- Cruel impatience !- What envious powers have wrought impossibilities in your favour !- But I will not be wholly disappointed .- Since I cannot die to save, I will not survive you."

Dionysius heard, beheld, and considered all, with astonishment. His heart was touched; his eyes were opened; and he could no longer refuse his assent to truths, so incontestibly proved by sacts. He descended from his throne. He ascended the scassified. "Live; live, ye incomparable pair!" he exclaimed. "Ye have borne unquestionable testimony to the existence of virtue!—Live happy! live renowned! And, O! form me by your precepts, as you have invited me by your example, to be worthy of the participation of so facred a friendship."

MYTHOLOGY.

NE of the most considerable branches of the belleslettres is MYTHOLOGY, which is well known to confilt of the wildest reveries and inconsistencies; sometimes indeed deduced from facts, without date, order, or connection: and in certain instances, these very facts are variously reprefented and frequently repeated. This promifcuous affemblage of truth and fiction would long fince have been univerfally exploded, had it not been for the absolute necesfiry of making it a preparatory fludy for the elucidation of the ancient writers; to point out the beauties of poetry, painting, and statuary; as well as for a right understanding of numberless expressions, such as a Muse, a Grace, a Hebe, &c. words which present us with poetic images, and can never be comprehended, but by a general acquaintance with the FARULOUS GODS and HEROES OF ANTI-

1. JUPITER.

He fpoke, and awful bends his fable brows:
Shakes his ambrofial curls, and gives the nod;
The stamp of fate, and fanction of the God:
High heav'n with trembling the dread fignal took,
And all Olympus to the centre shook.

THE Cart'agenians called this divinity Ammon; the Babylonians Belus; the Egyptians Serapic; the Athenians the Olympian Jupiter; and the Romans the Capitoline Jupiter. Besides these, almost every other nation, and even city, had its respective Jupiter, and particular name.—Varro enumerates no less than three hundred. Virgil styles him the Father of the Gods and King of Men.

The ancient poets make him the fon of Saturn and Ops, brought up on mount Ida in Crete; who, in process of time, married his fifter Juno, and dethroned his father.

Mythologists suppose that Jupiter was really King of Crete, and contemporary with the patriarch Abraham: that he deposed his father Saturn, and divided his paternal inheritance with his brothers Neptune and Pluto. And because the eastern part was governed by him, the western by Pluto, and the maritime parts by Neptune;—hence Paganism represented Jupiter the first of Gods, Pluto of the infernal regions, and Neptune of the fea.

But the thinking part of the heathens believed that there was but one great Being, who made, p eferved, and allusted all things. When they confidered him as influencing human affairs in various manners, they gave him as many different names; and from this fource-'tis prefumed they derived all their immense catalogue of nominal divinities. When He thundered, they called him Jupiter; when he calmed the seas, Neptune; when he guided their councils, Minerva; and when he gave them strength in battle, Mars.

The Capitoline Jupiter is feated in a curule chair in his chief temple; in his right hand he graips his fulmen, and in his left he holds his sceptre, as supreme arbiter of earth and heaven.

9. PNEPTUNE.

At Jove incens'd, with grief and fury floring,
Prope down the rocky fleep he rush'd along;
Fierce as he pass'd, the losty mountains nod;
The forests shake! earth trembled as he trod,
And felt the footsteps of th' immortal god.

Thus deity is fabled to be also the son of Saturn and Ops, and god of the seas. He married Amphyrite, became famous for his amours, and was with Apollo thrust out of heaven for having conspired against his brother Jupiter. On a medal of Adrian, Neptune is standing with his trident in his right hand, holding a dolphin in his lest; his foot against part of a ship, implying that he presided over the inland seas, particularly the Mediterranean. The poets have likewise represented him as passing over the calm surface of the waters in his chariot, drawn by sea-horses.

Where'er he guides

His finny courfers, and in triumph rides,
The waves unrufile, and the fea fubfides.

3. JUNO.

But I, who walk in awful state above, The majesty of heav'n, the fister-wife of Jove.

Juno is styled the Queen of Heaven, being the wife and fifter of the immortal Jove. Her progeny were Vulcan, Mars, and Hebe. The Argivi called her Argiva; the priests Calendaris; Curis, from her spear; Cingula, trota the girdle worn by brides; and Juga, as goddess of marriage. She was also addressed under the names of Lucina, Moneta, Regina, &c.

The Stoics believe that Juno is meant the air; and her being called Jupiter's wife, because the air being naturally cold, is warmed by Jupiter or fire. The Juno Matrona, or Romana, was the favourite one among the Romans; she is feen in statues and on gems, in a long robe, covering her from head to foot, through a principle of decency.

4. CERES.

First Ceres taught the ground with grain to fow. And arm'd with iron shares the crooked plough. Ceres first tam'd us with her gentle laws,

From her kind hand the world subfiltence draws CERES, daughter of Saturn and Ops, and Goddess of Agriculture, is faid to be fo very beautiful, as to be feduced even by her brothers Jupiter and Neptune; by the former the had Proferpine, and by the latter Arion. Poets and artifts represent her crowned with corn or poppies, and her robes falling to the feet. The facrifices instituted to her honour were principally the Eleufinia, so called because they were first celebrated at Eleusis.

5. MINERVA.

High in the midft the blue-ey'd virgin flies ; From rank to rank the darts her ardent eyes : The dreadful ægis, Jove's immortal shield, Blaz'd on her arm, and lighten'd all the field : Round the vast orb an hundred serpents roll'd, Form'd the bright fringe, and feem'd to burn in gold. MINERVA, daughter of Jupiter, and Goddels of Wife dom, Arts, and War. Her principal names were Pailas, from having flain a giant of that name; dihena, motherles; Parthenes, a virgin; and Mufica, as inventrels of the pipe. The poets feigned that Minerva sprang from the brain of Jupiter, intimating that the wir and ingenuity of man did not invent the useful sciences, but were derived from the inexhauftless fountain of divine goodness and wisdom.

Jupiter, Juno, and Minerva were deemed guardians of the Roman people, and are often represented together on their gems and medals .- The eagle accompanies Jupiter, a peacock Juno, and an owl Minerva. Poets fpeak of her as very beautiful, but describe her as more terrible, and dealing out her thunders as well as Juno-hence 'tis probable that all three were confidered by the Romans as one and the fame deity, under different names and particular attributes.

6. VULCAN.

High-eminent above the works divine,
Where heaven's far-beaming brazen mansions shine;
There the lame architect the goddess found,
Obscure in smoke, his forges slaming round;
While bath'd in sweat from fire to fire he slew,
And, pussing loud, the roaring bellows blew.

This deity married Venus, and forged the thunderbolts of Jupiter: He is however portrayed by some of the poets as a mere mortal blacksmith, with the addition of his being a cripple.

7. MARS.

The god of battles in his angry mood, Clashing his sword against his brazen shield, Let loose the reins, and scours along the field: Before the wind his siery coursers sly; Groans the sad earth, resounds the rattling sky: Wrath, terror, treason, turnult, and despair, Dire faces, and deform'd, surround the car, Friends of the god, and followers of the war.

Mans, the fon of Juno, and God of War. He passionately loved Venus, and was detected in his amours with that goddess by her husband Vulcan. His principal names were Mavors, Ares, Gravidus, and Quirinus. He is always represented with the attributes, a spear and a helmet; his chariot drawn by Fear and Terror.—sometimes Discord goes before, Clamour and Anger closely following.

STORY OF AMELIA WOODLY.

I AM determined,' foid I, ' to go forward this even-

. But the roads are fo bad, and night will be here, before you are aware,' faid the landlord.

It was to no purpole. All his rhetoric was thrown away upon me, so that notwithstanding my friend's house was twelve miles distant from the ian, and the greatest part of the way lay along a bye-road, on which it would be impossible, whatever were the urgency of the occasion, to make much expedition; I persisted in my determination, and mounted my horse about 4 o'clock, in the afternoon of a cloudy day in the month of February.

Having not feen the friend whom I was going to vifit, for a long time, my attention was fo abforbed in anticipating the joyful meeting which I expected, that upon recovering from my reverie and looking about me towards the approach of night, I began to fuspect that I had by some means or other lost my way. I determined however to press forward at all events, in hopes of meeting with some cottage where I might procure the necessary information. I therefore spurred my horse, and went on—but no human habitation was in view.

In the mean time the shades of evening deepened around me, and some black clouds which were gathering in the west, seemed to portend an approaching storm. I began now to repent that I had not taken my landlord's advice; but it was too late to reslect upon that alternative; and I concluded that it was impossible that I could ride much serther in this part of the country, without meeting with some cottage or other.

The wind now began to whifile amongst the leastless branches. The found was cold and cheerless. I buttoned my great-coat round me, and listened to the fighing of the blast. A few scattered drops soon began to fall, which were shortly succeeded by a heavy rain.

Uncertain whither the track which I was pursuing would lead me, I kept forward with doubt and hefitation, 'till at the termination of a long miry lane, I suddenly found myself upon an open space skirted with trees. The dim twinkling of two or three lights marked the fituation of as many cottages which were scattered about it.

At this fight I felt my spirits revive, however indifferent the accommodations might be, which the inhabitants of this little fpot might have it in their power to offer me; yet the coarfest fare and the hardest bed were comparative luxuries, to the probability of being, during the whole night, exposed to the fury of the tempest. I crossed the green and rode up to the nearest light which presented itself-I soon arrived at a neat little cottage, the whiteness of which rendered it visible even amidit the darkness of the night. A little court furrounded with a white paling. prevented me from riding up to the door; I difmounted, and opened the gate. The noise which I made aroused a dog, who came barking towards me; and at the fame moment, the door of the house opened, and a man, plainly but genteelly dreft, appeared at it with a candle in his hand. I explained to him my fituation as briefly as I could, which he littened to with an air of kindness and benevolence-and after informing me that the nearest inn was above three miles farther, and affuring me that he was rejoiced at my having found out his little habitation, infiited upon my being his guest for that night.

He led me into a neat little parlour, enlivened by a cheerful fire, where he defired me to rest 'till he could procure me some dry clothes; an accommodation of which I stood greatly in need, as my own were completely drenched by the rain. I was soon equipped, and began to listen with complacency, to the blast that was howling around our little habitation, and to the dashing of the rain against the casement. These circumstances added to the enjoyment of a little room cheerfully lighted up, and effectually secured from the damp chill of the atmosphere, by a blazing wood-fire.

After an interval of a few minutes, the stranger asked my name; I readily informed him of it, and was not a little delighted to find that he was intimately acquainted with that friend whom it had been my intention to vist. From the circumstance of this mutual acquaintance, referve was soon banished from our intercourse, and in return he informed me that his name was Woodly.

"My family," faid he, " is finall-I have a niece who lives with me, and whole fociety constitutes the chief enjoyment of my life; the is at prefent engaged in some little domestic arrangements, which the unexpected arrival of our guest renders necessary. Were she not my relation, I should fay that she is one of the most amiable of human beings. Although we have no neighbour with whom we affociate, nearer to us than your friend, whose residence is at the distance of fix miles; yet I never feel my hours hang heavy upon my hands, for I am employed in adding to her improvements, and contemplating her progress in them. I had once a daughter who promifed to be like her, but the is gone." He ftopt; the fubject feemed to oppress him; after a little struggle with his feelings, he refumed his composure and rose up, saying that he would look after his niece and introduce her.

Whilft he was abfent, I employed myfelf in examining the furniture of the apartment. Had I not been in a man-'ner prepared for it, by the urbanny of my hoft, I thould have been surprized at the elegant style in which it was fitted up. A piano forte stood in one corner of the room, with a flute and feveral mufic books near it, and a final! book-case was filled with a collection of the best authors. Thad just time to read the titles of about a dozen of them. when he returned, introducing a young lady, whole beauty and elégance of form were eminently striking. She paid her compliments to me with an air of natural politeness, which charmed, and a na veté which intercited me, and we had a most agreeable and animated conversation, which lafted till supper-time .- The part which she bore in it, evinced firong powers of mind, but at the same time, discovered the most perfect simplicity, and ignorance of the world. To her vouthful imagination, every thing appeared in the gayest colours, and unconscious of evil herfelf, the suspected it not in others. What a pity that society should be so impersectly constituted that an intercourse with it, soon dissipates this pleasing illusion.

The innocent playfulnets of her temper, formed an agreeable contraft to the gravity of her uncle, in whose countenance, I sometimes observed an interesting expression of melancholy, for which I selt an emotion of veneration, mingled with a desire of knowing its cause, but I resected, that I had no claim upon his considence, from so shore an acquaintance.

After support, at my solicitation, Amelia sat down to her piano forte, and played several tunes, in some of which her uncle, who was an excellent performer upon the successful secompanied her. Her voice was low and plaintive, but inexpressibly sweet, and she sung some pathetic Scotch airs, with so much tenderness and feeling, that I perceived the trars roll unconsciously down my cheek; and when I shortly after retired to the apartment which was provided for me, I could not but contemplate this as the abode of peace and harmony.

The next day the rain was incessant, so that I was obliged to protract my stay, a circumstance, which in such an agreeable situation, I selt no disposition to regret.—I was this day more and more delighted with my worthy host, and his amiable niece. The day was agreeably diversified with reading, convertation and music, and I was forry when the lateness of the hour obliged us to separate for the night.

On the following morning, the fun rose with unusual splendour, and revived the drooping aspect of nature; I had then an opportunity of beholding the beautiful situation of the cottage. One window of my chamber, commanded a prospect over a rich vale, to the Bristol Channel, which was about a mile distant. Beyond it, the bold o-t-line of the Welsh Mountains, bounded the view in a manner most truly picturesque. The opposite one, which was shaded by a woodbine, whose beautiful tendrils crept along the grass, commanded a view much more limited, as it comprehended only a small extent of country, enlivened with a sew scattered cottages, whose poor appearance set off to advantage, the neatness of my friend's little man-

At parting with my new acquaintances, I was not backward in expressing the pleasure and satisfaction which I had derived from my visit; and received a most urgent invitation to repeat it, which I promised to do, the first time that my business would permit me to revisit that part of the country.

After I had reached my friend Belford's habitation, and the first falutations were over, I informed him of my adventure, and requested him to acquaint me with all the particulars he knew, relative to the amiable family whom I had just quitted; he complied in nearly the following terms.

" George Woodly is one of the most benevolent and amiable of men: He has refided in that feeluded fituation in which you faw him, for nearly ten years; and has rendered himself universally beloved by the mildness of his manners, and the goodness of his heart. He married early in life a most amiable woman, whom he had the misfortune to lose at the time when she presented bim with the first pledge of their mutual affection: which to a mind ardent and enthusiastic as his, was a source of deep and almost insuperable affliction. But his attention was roused from a melancholy brooding over his forrows, by the attention which he thought himfelf bound to pay to the little infant, whose birth had cost her unfortunate mother so dear. Her affection and infantine endearments feemed to repay every eare, and the exhibited specimens of early capacity, when a violent fever which raged in the town where he lived, removed this object of his parental care, when the had just attained her ninth year. This stroke overwhelmed him-he retired hither and for a long time studiously feeluded himfelf from fociety, and indulged in the luxury of filent melancholy, an indulgence which might have had the most unfortunate effect upon his mind, had not the care of an orphan child devolved upon him by the death of an elder brother. This event obliged him to exert himfelf, as the arrangement of his brother's affairs was attended with fome difficulty. Deeply imprest with the importance of the charge entrusted to him, he brought the youthful orphan home with him, where he has ever fince, treated her with all the fondness of a most affectionate parent. Her fociety and attention, amply repay his tenderness, and though owing to the enthusiasm of his character, his melancholy has now become habitual, and is too deeply rooted to be removed, it no longer forms a disagreeable trait in his character, but gives it an amiable, and interesting finish.

"Of Amelia I shall say nothing, for you have seen her.

-The simplicity and openness of her character disclose her hear to you at once, and its emotions are too pure to need the gloss of deception.

"The only cares, which now ferm to agitate the bosom of Woodly, proceed from his solicitude to see this amiable girl, comfortably settled in life. I have often suggested to him, the little chance that there is of such an event, if he persists in such an absolute seclusion from the world, and represented the danger of a heart so simple being attracted by an object, unworthy of such a treasure. This picture alarmed him, but the effort of quitting his retirement, was too great for him. He shrinks from society. He seems in a great degree to have lost his relish for it, and though with me he is always open and unreserved, and sometimes even theerful, yet I see that he would consider a return to the haunts of men, as so severe a punishment, that I have for some time ceased to urge him upon the subject."

This account interested me shill more for my new friends; and before I left Somerfetshire, I rode over and paid them a morning visit. After spending about a week with my friend Belford, various avocations obliged me to return to the Metropolis, and shortly after to visit the Continent; so that it was upwards of eighteen months before I visited that part of England again.

A FOEM, from MACPHERSON's Translation of the POEMS of OSSIAN, Son of FINGAL.

THE ARGUMENT.

After an address to Malvina, the daughter of Toscar, Ossian proceeds to relate his own expedition to Fuarfed, an island of Scandinavia. Mal-orchol, king of Fuarfed, being hard pressed in war, by Ton-thormod, chief of Sar-dronlo, (who had demanded, in vain, the daughter of Mal-orchol in marriage) Fingal sent Ossian to his aid. Ossian, on the day after his arrival, came to battle with Ton-thormod, and took him prisoner. Mal-orchol offers his daughter Osna-morul to Ossian; but he, discovering her passion for Ton-thormod, generously surrenders her to her lover, and brings about a reconciliation between the two kings.

As flies the unconflant fun, over Lormon's graffy hill; fo pass the tales of old, along my foul, by night. When hards are removed to their place; when harps are hung in Selma's hall; then comes a voice to Ossian, and awakes his foul. It is the voice of years that are gone: they roll before me, with all their deeds. I seize the tales as they pass, and pour them forth in song. Nor a troubled stream is the song of the king, it is like the rising of music from Lutha of the strings, Lutha of many strings, not silent are thy streamy rocks, when the white hards of Malvina move upon the harp. Light of the shadowy thoughts, that sly across my soul, daughter of Toscar of helmets, wilt thou not hear the song! We call back, maid of Lutha, the years that have rolled away.

It was in the days of the king*, while yet my locks were young, that I marked Con-cathlint, on high, from

In Col-coiled, I bound my fails, and fent my fword to Mal-orchol of shells. He knew the signal of Albion, and his joy arose. He came from his own high hall, and seized my hand in grief. "Why comes the race of heroes to a falling king? Ton-thormod of many spears is the chief of wavy Sar-dronlo. He saw and loved my daughter white-bosomed Oina-morul. He sought; I denied the maid; for our sathers had been soes. He came, with battle, to Fuarsed. My people are rolled away. Why comes the race of heroes to a falling king?"

I come not, I faid, to look, like a boy, on the ffrife. Fingal remembers Mal-orchol, and his hall for ftrangers. From his waves, the warrior descended, on thy woody ifle. Thou wert no cloud before him. Thy feast was spread with songs. For this my sword shall rise; and thy soes perhaps may fail. Our friends are not forgot in their danger, though distant is our land.

Son of the daring Trenmor, thy words are like the voice of Cruth-loda, when he speaks, from his parting cloud, strong dweller of the sky! Many have rejoiced at my feast; but they all have forgot Mal-orchol. I have looked towards all the winds, but no white fails were seen. But guish the pole-star by that name. A song, which is still in tepute, among the sea-faring part of the Highlanders, alludes to this passage of Ossian. The author commends the knowledge of Ossian in sea affairs, a merit, which, perhaps, sew of us moderns will allow him, or any in the age in which he lived. One thing is certain, that the Caledonians often made their way through the dangerous and tempessuous seas of Scandinavia; which is more, perhaps, than the more polished nations, subssisting in those times, dared to venture. In estimating the degree of knowledge of arts among the ancients, we ought not to bring it into comparison with the improvements of modern times. Our advantages over them proceed more from accident, than any merit of ours.

He went. On the harp arofe the white hands of Oinamorul She waked her own fad tale, from every treabling string. I stood in silence; for bright in her locks was the daughter of many isles. Her eyes were like two stars, looking forward through a rushing shower. The mariner marks them on high, and blesses the lovely beams. With morning we rushed to battle, to Tormul's resounding stream: the soe moved to the sound of Ton-thormod's body shield. From wing to wing the strife was mixed. I met the chief of Sar-dronlo. Wide slew his broken steel. I seized the king in sight. I gave his hand, bound fast with thongs, to Mal-orchol, the giver of shells. Joy rose at the feast of Fuarfed, for the soe had failed. Ton-thormod turned his sace away from Oina-morul of isles.

The fentiments of a certain old bard are agreeable to this obfervation. He, poetically, compares a great man to a fire kindled in a defart place. When the trunk, which fed the fire, is confuned, the smoke departs on all the winds. So the flatterers for fake their chief, when his power declines." I have chosen to give a paraphrase, rather than a translation, of this paifage, as the original is verbole and frothy, notwithstanding of the sentimental merit of the author. He was one of the less ancient bards, and their compositions are not nervous enough to bear a literal translation.

In the hall I lay in night. Mine eyes were half closed in sleep. Soft music came to mine ear: it was like the rising breeze, that whirls, at first, the thistle's beard; then slies, dark-shadowy, over the grass. It was the maid of fuarfed wild: she raised the nightly song; for she knew that my soul was a stream, that slowed at pleasant sounds.

Who looks, the faid, from his rock, on ocean's cloting mist? His long locks, like the raven's wing, are wandering on the blast. Stately are his steps in grief. The tears are in his eyes. His manly breast is heaving over his bursting foul. Retire, I am distant far; a wanderer in lands unknown. Though the race of kings are around me, yet my foul is dark. Why have our fathers been foes, Tonthormod love of maids!

Soft voice of the streamy isle, why dost thou mourn by night; the race of daring Trenmor are not the dark in soul. Thou shalt not wander, by streams unknown, blue eyed Oina-morul. Within this bosom is a voice; it comes not to other ears; it bids Ossian hear the hapless in the hour of woe. Retire, soft singer by night; Ton-thormod shall not mourn on his tock.

With morning I loofed the king. I gave the long-haired maid. Mal-orchol heard my words, in the midft of his echoing halls. "King of Fuarfed wild, why should Tonthormod mourn? He is of the race of heroes, and a slame in war. Your fathers have been foes, but now their dim ghosts rejoice in death. They stretch their arms of mist to the same shell in Loda. Forget their rage, ye warriors, it was the cloud of other years."

Such were the deeds of Offian, while yet his locks were young: though loveliness, with a robe of beams, clothed the daughter of many ifles. We call back, maid of Lutha, the years that have rolled away!

ASEM AND SALNED.

AN EASTERN TALE.

YOUNG merchant of Bafra had one day the pleafure to fee a lady, whose shape and motion were uncommonly elegant, enter his warehouse and cheapen some stuffs; he was yet more charmed with her voice and manner, and he engaged her in conversation with the greater facility as his person was also agreeable to her; for the same reason the was the more impatient to difplay her referve of beauty, and, lifting up her veil a little, under pretence of heat, fhe compleated her conques. The merchant, who was a batchelor, found means to gratify and conceal his curiofity, and without the unpoliteness of a direct question, he learnt that the was a citizen's daughter, that her fortune was not large, and that the was unmarried : he therefore declared his passion with the less diffidence, as it was encouraged by the fuperiority of his wealth, and increased by the hopes of fuccefs. He told her he should think himself the most happy of mankind if she would permit him to ask her of her father in marriage, and the better to convince her of the fincerity of his declaration, and dispose her to favour his fuit, he threw himself upon his knees. The lady then quite withdrew her veil, and discovered all the beauties of her face, that were now heightened by the glow which the merchant's attitude and proposition had diffused over them, telling him that before he engaged further in an affair of fo great moment, it was fit he fhould have a more perfect knowledge of her perfon : look at me, fays the, confider well what kind of a companion you are about to chuse for life, and if my appearance does not alter your purpose, I shall not think myself less interested than you in the fuccess of your application to my father. The merchant was now transported with joy, and expressed the utmost impatience to obtain the happiness which he had leave to folicit. In this disposition they parted, and, as he did not delay the negociation of the affair, it was in a few days concluded in his favour. The father of Salned, which was the name of the lady, confented with joy to a match that was fo advantageous to his daughter, and the nuptials were celebrated as foon as the necessary preparations could be made. It happened that in the sports of the wedding day, Salned got a flight fall, but the mirth of the company was interrupted only by the first fright, which was diffipated in a moment, as the bride did not appear to have received any hurt. The new married couple being at length left alone, the bridegroom, whole name was Afem, renewed his protestations of eternal love, adding, his felicity was fo perfect, that it left room in his breast for no wish but that of its continuance. Salned returned his careffes with equal terndernels, and expressed the fame fense of her felicity It was you, faid the, that first touched my bosom with defire; till I saw you I regarded all men not only with indifference but contempt, and proudly resolved never to exchange liberty for dependance, or to derive my happiness from another; but you have inspired me with new fentiments, and I would rather be the flave of Afein than the mistress of the world. At these words her voice faltered, and the was feized with the most violent fensations of pain. Asem started from his bed and called his domestics, and the convultions of Salaed still increasing, the was, in a thort time, delivered of a child, whose birth had been precipitated by her fall. Afem remained fome time motionless and filent, and Salned fainted away, but recovered before his aftonishment and grief gave way to indignation.-Perfidious woman, faid he, with what deceitful blandishments hast thou abused my ear, and with what hateful objects haft thou blafted my fight! Thy foul deferves not the tenderness which thy form inspired, and the love that thy beauty produced is turned into hatred by thy falschood. I who lately gazed upon thee with transport, have now no means of happiness but to see thee no more. Salned burst into tears, and, in a voice that was every moment interrupted by involuntary expressions of pain and forrow, my dear husband, faid she, if I may still dare to call you by that tender name, your reproaches, though they are not unreasonable, are yet unmerited. I am indeed a mother, but I know not by what means. If I deceive you, may you hate me for ever, or if I am still suspected, as there is reason for suspicion, punish the imaginary fault of a guiltless wife, and I will die content, as I can neither complain of you nor reproach myfelf. Hope not, replied Afem, again to deceive me by this flow of innocence, the credulity even of love cannot be abused with impossibilities, and I ought to wash out the stain of my honour with thy blood; but I abandon thee to life, a revenge, which though it is more flow, is perhaps more fure, fince the confciousness of guilt is a perpetual scourge, and the remembrance of felicity imbitters despair. Has heaven then, faid Salned, wrought a mericle only to make me wretched? Afem diffained reply, and immediately divorcing his wife, he fent her back to her father, who would no more own her for his child; and the unhappy beauty, enfeebled by pain and distracted with grief departed from the city without knowing whither to go, or by what means to fublift: her mind was filled with the contemplation of her own calamity, and the continued to wander without either fear or defign, till the was stopped by weariness; and at the close of day the fought thelter in the corner of a wood, where fitting down to pass the night, the horrors of her fituation rushed still more forcibly upon her mind; but her attention was fuddenly diverted by fome fighs and complaints which were uttered at a small distance; and being too wretched to be timorous, fhe hafted towards the place from whence the voice feemed to proceed, and foon discovered a young woman much wounded, who appeared to be bleeding to death. She ran to her and afked eagerly by what misfortune she had been brought into that place and condition. I am dying, faid Garaldi, for that was the name of the lady, by the hands of the only man I have ever loved, and for whom my heart ftill overflows with tenderness, though my life is ebbing away from the wounds which he has given me; he is justified, and yet I am innocent. These words revived in Salned's bosom the keen sense of her own mistortunes, which again melted her into tears, and Garaldi becoming weaker and weaker, at length fainted and fell backwards

Salned was again roused by this accident, the raised Garaldi from the ground, and tearing some of her linnen, stopped the bleeding of her wounds. In this distress the looked eagerly round her, though the despaired of the athitance which the fought, and perceiving a glimmering light not far off, the drew, as well as the could, the unhappy Garaldi towards it, and came at length to the hut of a Santon, whom the found to abstracted by meditation from external objects, that he did not hear her approach. nor take the least notice even when she entered his hut. Sained therefore went to him, and having roused him from his reverie, impatiently demanded his affistance for the lady whom the ftill fultained in her arms. The Santon regarded this fudden and unexpected opportunity of exerciling his charity as the effect of his prayer; he recovered Garaldi with fome effences, he examined her wounds, which appeared not to be dangerous, and dreffed them with some balsam of wonderful virtue, which he had prepared with his own hands, and with which he had been used to affist the faithful. He then made ready a bed of rushes for the ladies, and fetting before them some dates and other fruits, apologized for the simplicity of the repast, which, he faid, he hoped they would accept as the good will of poverty; and then he withdrew, telling them he should be at hand, and defired that they would call him if he should be wanted. The ladies were most sensibly touched at the unaffected charity. and decent carriage of the good old man, and after a flight repail they went to reft. In the morning the Santon found that the wounds of his patient were almost healed, and expreffed his curiofity to know from what causes so extraordinary a vifit had proceeded; Salned first related her adventures, at which he expressed the utmost astonishment, but was so polite as not to drop the least intimation that he doubted of her innocence. My adventure, faid Garaldi, is not less extraordinary, and it would be injurious in me not to believe Salned innocent, fince it is my misfortune to appear equally guilty without having any caufe to reproach myfelf. The person who gave me these wounds yesterday in the wood is a lord of the city of Bafra, who, about ten years ago received me into his family. Both my parents died when I was no more than fix years old, and left me exposed to every species of distress, nor did any offer me affiftance or protection, till Carim, the lord whom I before mentioned, having feen me by accident, and being pleafed with my looks and touched at my diffrefs, would not leave me to the uncertain bounty of the public, or the temptations of mifery. He took me to his house, educated me as his daughter, and was charmed with my improvement. My beauty and my wit became every day more confpicuous; Carim feemed to derive greater pleafure from my company, and my gratitude increased in proportion to his love; he called me his daughter, and I careffed him as my father. But when I was about ten years old his tenderness assumed a different appearance; he now called me his dear Garaldi, and without being taught, I called him my dear Carim. Love was suffered to take possession of our hearts without refistance, and at length he declared his intention to make me his wife.

SKETCH OF THE LIFE OF HOMER.

HIS wonderful genius, this father of genuine poetry, has ennobled human nature, and claims the first place in the Temple of Fame. He flourished about 900 years before the christian æra.

To the eternal honour of this great bard, temples have been raifed; and yet, strange to tell, this prince of poets passed the greatest part of his life as a fugitive, neglected and unknown.

Among the vaft divertity of opinions concerning Homer, the most probable is, that he was a native of Smyrna. Phemius, struck with the rising talents of our juvenile poet, took upon him the charge of his education: The scholar soon surpassed his master; Smyrna admir'd his genius, and his same drew strangers to this city to hear him recite his compositions.

A captain in the sea service, called Mentes, was intimately sequainted with our poet, and prevailed on him to travel with him into foreign countries. With this friend he made the tour of Asia, Egypt and Greece, treasuring up the immense acquisitions of learning he had gleaned from the sages, the maxims of the priests at Delphos, the sublime writings of Linus, Orpheus, Museus, &c. for nothing escaped the penetration of this great observer of men and things. His understanding became enlarged by his unwearied researches in politics, morality and religion: and from this great source his sentiments were refined, and his imagination enriched by contemplating such an infinity of objects.

His fight began to fail him during his residence at Ithaca, while he was employed in composing his Odyssey; nevertheless his passion for travelling induced him to accompany Mentes in farther researches, which unhappily were soon interrupted by a total loss of sight. It is easy to imagine the great affliction he necessarily suffered upon a missortune of that nature.

Thestorides, taking an advantage of our poet's poverty, offered him an asylum, on conditions of his communicating to him his writings; Homer accepts the generous offer, and accordingly took up his abode with this supposed friend. Thestorides no sooner obtained possession of such a treasure, than he sted to Chios, where he opened a public school, and recited the poems of Homer as his own performances.

This great man, after a feries of misfortunes and disappointments, found at last some repose at Chios, where he put to shame and confusion his perfidious plagiarist, who was peaceably enjoying the fruits of the glory he had so clandestinely usurped. The inhabitants of this city were so struck with these immortal poems, that they generously assigned their author a sufficient pension to make the rest of his days comfortable and happy.

Lycurgus, that celebrated legislator, was the first who introduced the works of Homer into Greece; which were then in detached pieces, and intitled Rhapsodies. Pysistratus collected these rhapsodies together, and divided the Iliad and Odyssey, each into 24 books. Solon ordained as a law, that the poems of Homer should be sung at all public solemnities, and that children should be taught to recite them from memory. Copies were soon after dispersed over Greece, and Athens had the glory of handing them down to posterity. Well may the enraptur'd modern sing,

How sweet the numbers swell,
While Homer waves his soul-enchanting wand
Entranc'd the listening passions stand,
Charm'd with the magic of his shell.
Whether to arms his trump resounds,
The heart with martial ardour bounds;
Or sprightly themes his hand employ,
Instant we catch the spreading joy;
Or when in notes majestic, soft, and slow,
He bids the solemn streams of sorrow slow,
Amaz'd we hear the sadly pleasing strain,
While tender anguish steals thro' every vein.

Father of Verse, whose eagle flight
Fatigues the gazer's aching fight,
And strains th' aspiring mind;
Teach me thy wonderous heights to view,
With trembling wings thy steps pursue,
And leave the lessening world behind.

Homer among the Grecians acquired the glorious appellation—THE FATHER OF WISDOM AND VIRTUE. Horace tells us this great mafter instructed mankind in their duties much better than the philosophers.

INKLE AND YARICO.

MERCATOR* tempted by the happy times, Quits his own shore for Oriental climes, With choicest goods his wealthy vessel lades, And leaves for India's, Britain's cooler shades. But as, enraptur'd with indulgent gales, That kiss'd each wave, and swell'd the cutling fails; The vessel drove, a sudden burst of rain Impetuous ruffled the Cerulean plain; Conflicting winds descend with rapid flight, And, whirl'd in hurricane, tumultuous fight: Surges on furges, waves on waves arife, That proudly foam, and blot the azure fkies; The cordage rattles, and with fails declin'd, The thip bewilder'd drives before the wind; Till weaken'd with th' extremes of Ocean's pow'r, At last she bulg'd against the Indian shore. When from an ambush, lo! encircling round, A cloud of Indians thicken'd on the ground, And with barbaric rage, the crew they tore, Eat of their flesh, and quaff'd the streaming gore-All but MERCATOR ;-bim, lo! flight unfeen Now faves from death, and from the tragic fcene; With tim'rous hafte amid the woods he flies, (Fear in his heart, and horror in his eyes) Till spent with weariness, himself he laid. Beneath a waving elm's embracing shade, Where a long range of thick'ning forests grows, And twining boughs a cooling shade compose;

But lo! ere gentle fleep had lent her aid,
Forth from a thicket rush'd an Indian maid,*
Whom the hot fun-beams tempted out to rove
Thro' the thick mazes of this stady grove.
Alluring beauty and persuasive grace
Beam'd in her eye, and brighten'd in her face;
Her jetty tresses flowing hung behind,
And wildly wanton'd in each breeze of wind.

Refulgent jewels plac'd with artless care, And shining bugles glitter'd on her hair, Whose beams reslect the sun's meridian ray, And add new splendor to the blaze of day.

At once they faw, with wonder and furprife, Commutual paffion darting in their eyes, While from each bofom fympathetic fighs, And mutual heavings, mutual tears arife; The undiftinguish'd forms of speech imparts A tort'ring anguish to each longing heart, The pow'rs of language too deficient prove To shew the thrilling ecstacy of love; But souls like theirs, mysteriously wrought, Converse by silent sympathy of thought.

She led MERCATOR to a friendly shade,
A cooling grotto elegantly made,
Where sweet Sabæan odours fragrant bloom,
There smells diffusing round a rich perficine;
Where hyacinthus, and the purple rose,
A downy bed of various sweets compose.
She plac'd him there, and gave a choice repast,
Substantial food, delicious to the taste;
And in a curious shell with speed she brings
Transparent water from the limpid springs.—
Oft when the moon, in trembling streams of light,
A paler day shed o'er the gloom of night;
And when with gentle sighs the ev'ning breeze
Remurmur'd foftly thro' the whisp'ring trees,

^{*} Ser Vignette.

Pleas'd she would lead him thro' the shady scenes
Of Cassia groves and everlasting greens,
Too anxious lest each gale of breezy air,
Should hurt her love, or discompose his hair;
Or, while he slept, wou'd tune the melting song,
Or modulate the music of her tongue.—

Thus for fome months,—
Once, as they walk'd in a fequester'd grove,
And am'rous told the pleasing tale of love,
The Indian maid began, and with a figh,
That fetch'd a pearly tear into her eye,
Thus spoke (for to express herself she'd found
In English accents and distinguish'd found)

- ' Still as I view these ever-pleasing bow'rs,
- ' Once the dear scenes of thy BARSINA's hours,
- ' Corroding thoughts and fad reflections rife,
- ' And all the parent triumphs in my eyes.—
- " MERCATOR! oh, the thought disturbs my rest,
- ' And spreads its thrilling horrors in my breast.
- Once as I slept belide you foft cascade,
- While Cynthia's pearly beams around me play'd,
- Sudden appear'd a visionary fair,
- ' Whose radiant lustre brighten'd all the air;
- ' A virgin's vest the blooming phantom wore,
- ' And in her hand a verdent thyrsus bore;
- 'Then wav'd it thrice, and spoke, Unhappy Fair,
- ' And vanish'd from my fight in fluid air.
- ' O fay, my love, what means this phantom guest
- And why these horrors in my tortur'd breast?'

 She said, and ceas'd; her lucid eye-balls pour
 In chrystal streams the soft distilling show'r,

The falient blood its fprightly course disclains,
And curdling freezes in her icy veins;
Consussion on her falling spirits hung,
And half-form'd accents slutter'd on her tongue,
Rous'd from this fainting sit, Mercator press
The weeping beauty to his am'rous breast,
And sought by balmy words to calm her fears,
And stem the swelling torrent of her tears;

. Thus my BARSINA, as I view (he faid)

! Unrival'd beauties in my lovely maid,

Alas! thy forrows doubly touch my heart,

. With equal grief and fympathizing fmart;

Lach chrystal tear, with agonizing pains,

" Runs thro' my foul, and thrills along my veins.

' Heav'ns! fhall a nothing an ideal fhade, Whole poor existence is by fancy made

Diffuse its horrors through thy tender breaft,

' Taint ev'ry thought and discompose thy rest?

Why wast thou born with such a coward mind,

The fport of shadows, or a gale of wind?

" Forlake these barb'rous coasts, these savage plains,

Where tyranny and superstition reigns :

This arm shall guard BARSINA from the foe,

Repel each florm, and intercept each blow;

' Thou, lovelieft of thy fex, in me shall find

A tender parent, and a lover kind,

" And in my country, gloriously array'd,

" Shall shine in crimson, or more rich brocade;

And thy fweet charms with elegance express

" All the grand gay variety of dress."

These filken words an easy entrance find, And charm the poor deluded Indian's mind; Frequent the climbs a lofty mountain's brow, Her far-fretch'd eye-balls fkim the deeps below; At length an English ship, by tempests tost, For shelter makes th' inhospitable coast; The Indian fees, and rifing joys impart A thrilling pleafure to her longing heart; With eager hafte, borne on the zephyrs' wings, The joyful tidings to MERCATOR brings : They both afcend the ship- the azure sea Wafts them foontaneous on the chrystal way; The veiled drives, with foft refreshing gales, And foon Barbadoes greets the swelling fails. No more BARSINA's beauties now can move, But av'rice triumphs o'er the ties of love; The wretch, by that destructive passion sway'd, To flav'ry fold the hospitable maid.

She heard—and fell reluctant on his breath, Embrac'd the wretch, and with fond joys careft—Then strove to speak—in vain the accents rife, Her fault'ring breath evaporates in fighs;

Nature oppress'd grew weak—she swoons—around A general figh dissus'd a mournful found—An heart of adamant wou'd melt in woe, And barren rocks in copious torrents flow;

Marble wou'd weep, and sympathetic fighs

Force the pearl dewidrops from Barbarian eyes;

But he, relentless, fails before the wind,
And expeditious makes the port assign'd.

FEMALE EXCELLENCE.

TO M-

Beauties in vain their pretty eyes may roll, Charms strike the sense, but merit wins the soul.

Port.

NVARNISH'D truths I would impart, Nor please by flattery's fulfome art. The tear that gliftens in the eye, The tender sympathetic figh, Display the feelings of a mind, Pollels'd of fentiment refin'd. The lovelieft ornaments of youth Are filial duty, goodness, truth: These far outshine the brilliant's rays, And meric most exalted praise; Let vain coquets on form depend, Be dupes to every feerning friend, When beauty's transent reign is o'er, Nor fops admire nor fools adore: But fense and temper still can charm, And wrinkled age of pow'r difarm :

So finines M——, gen'rous maid, Upon whose cheek the roses fade; Who, if her parent seel a pain, Affection throbs in ev'ry vein, Silent becomes the favourite lyre, Nor prose, nor song a joy inspire: Thy virtues claim the rapt'rous lay; To thee, will genius homage pay, E'en at the palid stroke of death, Will thee applaud with sault'ring breath.

S. G.

SONNET TO THE LADIES.

WOMAN, thou fweet urbanity, to guile
Life's tedious course away—I love thy smile,
Thy brow soft animated, sweet to please,
Thy full-bright-eye, as vestal fire chaste,
Thy cheek like Hebe's bloom, and littling waist,
With native movement, elegance and ease.
Of these, the fair, from nature genuine boast,
Whose charms replete with wonder strikes the hose,
Yet when she meets my gaze, to sigh I'm prone,
That peerless beauty, in a Paphian form,
Like summer rose, is tribute to the worm,
Short boast that once inimitably shone.
But truth predominating points the meed
All here is short, whilst endless scenes succeed.

HEALTH.

COME, rofy Health, fair daughter of the morn, Thy peaceful bleffings shed; O come and cheer you drooping wretch forlorn, Reclin'd on youder bed! With thy whole train of heav'nly joys descend, To comfort his sad breast; Of his dread pain to make an happy end, And set his heart at rest.

When pain, disturber of the human frame, Attacks most potent kings, What is their mighty honour but a name, What all their costly things?

E'en to the beggar, if thou deign'st, fair Health,
Thy bleffings to impart,
Tho' he's posses'd of neither fame nor wealth,
What joy is in his heart!

BEAUTY TRIUMPHANT.

IN THE MANNER OF TIBULLUS.

YES, oft in pleasure have I pass'd the day
Near Avon's stream, or in the neighb'ring plains,
In looking at the artless lambkins play,
Or reading Pope's or Prior's easy strains.

In careless indolence I liv'd secure,

And look'd with pity on the wretch in Love:

Laugh'd at his darts, derided Cupid's pow'r,

And thought no nymph my stubborn heart could move.

Till Mira came, poffes'd of every grace,
And ev'ry virtue that adorns the mind;
So fweet her mien, fo heav'nly was her face,
I thought her one exceeding human kind!

But when the spoke, ah then, my heart was loft!

Then was my foul with fweet compassion mov'd;

I listen'd to her voice, with rapture lost,

I gaz'd! admir'd! and found at last I Lov's.
